Excerpt: . CHAPTER XIII Oxford s Welcome To Bindle I AT three o clock on the following day the down platform at Oxford station presented an almost gala appearance. Not only were the men of St. Joseph s there, but hundreds of undergraduates from other colleges, with rattles, whistles, horns, flags, and every other attribute of great rejoicing. Outside the station was a carriage with four horses, a piebald, a skewbald, a white, and another horse that seemed to have set out in life with a determination to be pink. Tom Little had himself selected the animals with elaborate care. A little distance away, standing in groups, was a band clothed gorgeously in scarlet and gold tunics and caps, and nondescript trousers, ranging from light gray to black. Tom Little had given careful instructions that as soon as Josiah Williams should emerge from the station,...
