The people are of first importance and so it may seem strange that the illustrations are of places. As one of the characters in A Lovely View of the Gasworks says, "It doesn't matter what's outside; it's what's inside 'at counts". But the decision was a deliberate one. The pictures set the background to the stories: the people are left to speak for themselves, for they do so effectively and their stories repay thoughtful reading. In the follow-up work at the end of this book there are several suggestions for your own writing. (These are marked with an asterisk*.) As you read these stories we think you will realise how many stories of your own are possible. Barstow is an encouraging writer. He writes...
