Excerpt: .it, that the curvature of the reflecting surfaces of the upper and lower prisms, but especially of the latter, is much too sharp. In the instance which I measured best, (second lower prism,) the horizon image, instead of being formed on the lamp, was formed eleven inches before reaching the centre of the lamp. The effect of this was to disperse the light up and down. In the present generally erroneous adjustment of these prisms there may be advantage in this, because it throws some light on the sea; but if the prisms were generally well adjusted, much of the light which would fall with great force on the sea would be lost. See, however, the last paragraph. 3. From a remark made by Mr. L. Sauter, it is plain that the peculiar effect of re.flecti0n is not fully understood by him. He said that the adjustment of the reflecting prisms was adapted to high flame but not to a low flame. But, in reality, an addition to the height of the flame (though very valuable for the dioptric part) adds nothing to the useful effect of the reflecting part, as I have repeatedly stated, and Mr. Sauter's remarks, therefore, must be without foundation, and expressed without clear understanding of the matter. It occurs to me to suggest for Professor Faraday's consideration, whether, in a place so accessible, gas might not be used, either manufactured on the spot or led from...
