Excerpt: .threats which gained reality from the fact that the pursuing forces of the Regent had occupied Falkland, about twenty miles distant. Knox s comrades hesitated, but he himself insisted upon using the occasion which God in His mercy had offered. For three days he preached in the presence of the doctors and the magistrates, setting forth the corruption of the papistrie and the duty of ejecting buyers and sellers from the temple; and on June 14 the magistrates, with the consent of the Prior and Sub-prior, formally resolved to remove all monuments of idolatry, which also they did with expedition. Crucifixes, pictures and vestments were collected, and, with a sense of retributive justice, burnt on the spot of the martyrdom of Walter Myln.³ When the Archbishop, who had fled, reported the proceedings at Falkland, the Regent was disposed to follow advice given her by the Cardinal of Lorraine to cut off the heads of all the Protestant rebels, but a battle would have been precarious, and an eight days armistice was arranged on Cupar Moor in the hope of making a permanent truce. But the Regent insisted that there must be no public preaching, and the Congregation were resolved to persevere. Before the eight days were past⁴ she had crossed the Forth and they had advanced to Perth, which they proceeded to set free (on June 25) from its garrison of Franco-Scots. From Perth they marched to Stirling and Linlithgow, and on June 28...
